The Victorian Road Safety Laws also require:

- Drivers will need to ensure that children younger than four years of age do not travel in the front seat of a vehicle with two or more rows.
- Drivers will also need to ensure that children aged four years to under seven years of age do not travel in the front seat of a vehicle with two or more rows unless all other back seats are occupied by children younger than seven years of age.
- Taxis will continue to be exempt from the child restraint requirements. When there is no suitable child restraint available a seat belt must be worn.
- The Road Safety Laws aim to cater for the majority of children; however children vary in shapes and sizes. The ages outlined above are an approximation only. If your child still fits the restraint, they should remain in their current restraint regardless of their age. Alternatively if your child is too big for the recommended restraint, they should use a restraint specified for the next age group. Vehicles with only one row of seats are exempt from the requirement that a child must sit in the rear seat.

*This chart allows you to check that your child and their car seat will be suitable for the National and Victorian Road Safety Laws. Application of the Australian Road Safety Laws may vary by state or territory, but following this chart will maximise your child's safety.
